The fall of Przemysl was due to the breach driven into the girdle of forts from the north by the Bayarian troops. The gap opened by the capture of five works was almost five miles wide and hig enough to drive a whole army through. The inner lines were, under the circumstances, utterly unable to resist the pressure. The garrison by rightfall Wednesday had been driven back to the outskirts of the city itself. The other forts of the fortress were exposed to attack from the rear as well as the front, and by dawn Thursday both fortress and town were restored to Austrian rule.
